POLICY BRIEF

Restore The Bankruptcy Fresh Start for Student Loan Borrowers

It is time to restore fairness to the bankruptcy system and give government and private student loan borrowers the same bankruptcy protections as consumers with other types of unsecured debt.

Rationale

- Student loan borrowers are trying to better themselves and contribute to the advancement of our nation and economy. Yet the current bankruptcy law treats students who face financial distress in the same severe way as people who are trying to discharge child support payments, alimony, overdue taxes and criminal fines.
This policy is bad for individual debtors who are being punished for trying to get an education and bad for our economy which is fueled by an educated work force.
- The current system deters students and graduates from trying again if they fail to capture the benefits of higher education the first time around.
- Treating student loans different in bankruptcy is based on the false assumption that higher education always leads to financial success.
Education often brings economic rewards, but not in all cases. Some borrowers choose to work in careers that are less lucrative and often for the public good. Others run into unexpected life traumas that lead to financial trauma. Still others attend fraudulent schools.
- There is no evidence that restoring consumer bankruptcy rights will make student loans less available or increase costs for other consumers.
- There has never been any evidence of significant abuse by student loan borrowers. Regardless, the new bankruptcy rules passed in 2005 are intended to address abuses and preserve the bankruptcy safety net for those borrowers who truly need it.
- Most consumers file for bankruptcy because of unexpected emergencies or traumas in their lives.
These borrowers should be given the same opportunity for a fresh start that is afforded other debtors.
- It is critical to act now during difficult economic times, particularly in restoring bankruptcy rights for private student loan borrowers.
We must defend the rights of student loan borrowers and protect them from the predatory practices of lenders from the moment they receive their loans.
